I saw Bill Tyler this morning. He had just come back from vacation and I had an instructive talk with him, as is always the case because of his wise judgment on French conditions.

Bill Benton called on me. He had been spending the summer on the Riviera. He is still carrying on his suit against McCarthy and says there is no question in his mind that McCarthy is financially crooked and should be brought to trial and convicted for violation of the Federal income tax laws.

Ellen and Jim Bruce and Josephine Forbes lunched with us. Ellen and Jim looked well after their Scotch shooting, which was a great success, their final total being about 2,000 grouse.

Baron Winspeare, an Italian [redacted] stationed in Luxembourg, came to see me in connection with a visa case for his daughter.

Jean Monnet arrived, disturbed over what he understands to be the instructions given to the French delegation for the Rome European Political Conference which in effect would whittle down almost to nothing its supranational aspects.

I left on the 7:03 train for Amiens, where I spent the night at the Grand Hotel.
